

The video and television landscape has undergone fundamental transition, from both consumer and programming perspectives. The implications for communications service providers are significant and far reaching, even though the final outcome is anything but certain. Every segment of the multimedia entertainment marketplace and ecosystem is in the process of being profoundly disintermediated by innovations in technology, consumer behavior, and content delivery.

This presentation focuses on current developments in the video arena, and reflects on the impact they're having on both service providers and subscribers, as this ongoing disruption continues to unfold.
